The belief that science and religion are locked in permanent conflict is one of the most durable stories of our age. It shapes school corridors and news coverage, and it leaves many people with the assumption that they will eventually have to choose.

What actually drives the perception of a war between science and Christian faith? And more importantly: what are we really disagreeing about? Beneath the familiar flashpoints lies a deeper and far more interesting set of disagreements. The evening is an invitation to set the conflict myth aside and enter the more demanding conversation it has been obscuring.
